Stainless steel and sustainability

Stainless Steel is a highly durable material which requires minimum maintenance and does not require additional protective coatings which could be potentially hazardous to the environment as well as human health. It outlasts many competing materials.

It is a valuable scrap material and is 100% recyclable. Stainless steel production incorporates a high level of recycled material, and in many cases 80% of charged material will be scrap stainless steel. New stainless steel comprises of at least 50% recycled stainless steel product and more than half the stainless steel produced today has already been another useful stainless steel product in the past.
